Women, Peace, and Security in the Military News Round Up—September 2023

ARTICLE: Gendering the Climate-Conflict Nexus

REPORTER: By Tobias Ide, Toda Peace Institute (08.29.23)

EXCERPT: But even from the limited research and discussion so far, one thing becomes clear: Gender is a key dimension of the climate-conflict nexus. My recent study, for instance, finds that if rebel groups have a large share of female members, they are more likely to escalate violence after climate-related disasters, and less likely to reduce fighting. This is because women provide additional labour and fighting force. Furthermore, women are often better than men in conducting specialised tasks, such as establishing relations with civilians (on which rebels might depend for support after disasters) or intelligence gathering (which is key in rapidly changing post-disaster contexts).

ARTICLE: More than Female Engagement Teams: The Value of Gender Advisors on Operation Allies Welcome

REPORTER: By Monica Herrera, We The Possible (08.28.23)

EXCERPT: Tomorrow marks two years since the United States initiated Operation Allies Welcome (OAW), an effort to provide temporary housing, transportation, medical screening, sustainment, and other support services for evacuees from Afghanistan as they were expedited through the resettlement process in the U.S. following the fall of Kabul. Between September to December 2021, I served as a Department of Defense (DoD) Gender Advisor at Task Force Liberty, one of eight “safe haven” locations that supported OAW.

I’ve been speaking about my experiences from OAW as part of DoD Gender Focal Point and Gender Advisor training and on panels at various conferences alongside my Women, Peace & Security (WPS) colleagues who also participated.

REPORTER: By Maj. Sara Ingrao, Army.mil (08.26.23)

EXCERPT: In 2019, the U.S. government released the Women, Peace, and Security (WPS) strategy with three lines of effort aimed at promoting gender equality and women's empowerment globally. The 5th SFAB has taken an essential step in advancing this strategy by assigning female Advisors to nearly every position across its formation. This move is significant and timely as it aims to promote women's participation in peacekeeping and security, a space where men (generally) occupy most decision-making roles.

ARTICLE: Filling the Blanks: Putting Gender into Military A.I.

REPORTER: By Shimona Mohan, Centre for Security, Strategy and Technology at ORF (08.21.23)

EXCERPT: Defence structures around the world are seeing a technological upheaving as new and emerging technologies like artificial intelligence (AI) are being added to military arsenals. However, military AI largely lacks precision and is often developed without any threat-modelling which takes gender into account, examples of which are already being seen in civilian applications of AI. Translated into a conflict environment, deploying such AI systems could mean that women and other genders would be disproportionately impacted by algorithmic biases. As military AI becomes more commonplace, the imperative is to mobilise gender-equal agendas for security and emerging technologies. This brief examines the gender-shaped gaps in the application of military AI and offers multi-faceted solutions to fill them.

ARTICLE: How Women, Peace, and Security Could Improve Integrated Deterrence

REPORTER: By Kinsey Spears, Newlines Institute for Strategy and Policy (08.14.23)

EXCERPT: In recent years, the U.S. has been increasingly focusing on the overarching goals of strategic competition and integrated deterrence, and including the WPS agenda will be vital to achieving those goals. Strategic competition is interpreted in a variety of ways within the U.S. government. However, in comments made at the Baltic Military Conference in 2021, Department of Defense (DOD) then-Undersecretary Colin Kahl defined an important component of integrated deterrence to be “working alongside our allies and partners to advance common interests and shared values.” WPS can provide crucial additional perspectives and approaches to this work, so institutionalizing the WPS agenda within strategic competition and integrated deterrence is a low-cost, high-reward value-add for the department.

ARTICLE: ICYMI—Wargaming as a Social Science Experiment

REPORTER: By Andrew L. Crabb, Joint Special Operations University (06.16.23)

EXCERPT: In August of 2022, my supervisor at the Joint Special Operations University challenged me with an unusual task. She wanted me to find ways to embed into our courseware operational factors identified in the Department of Defense’s (DoD) Women, Peace, and Security (WPS) Strategic Plan and Implementation framework. Although my first thought was that we might be stepping into a political minefield, as she explained the WPS factors—looking at the operational environment (OE) via the lens of gender culture, dynamics, and perspectives—it became readily apparent that this was a facet of planning that was new and held merit. Since special operations forces often claim the “human domain” as its operating milieu (Cleveland, 2016), gaining better and more nuanced insights into the OE was a worthy goal.
